On this part cular morning the carrier boy forgot to leave the paper. are all spending the day on the grounds of the Franklin School building. Several hundred strong, they stormed the building this morning before the sun was high in the sky, and have been much in evidence there, and there only, ever since.

They are calling for permits and badges-boys who work on the city streets must have them or be idle. As fast as they arrived on the scene the boys were hustled into line, so that they can be given badges in order of priority. During the day the line has continually stretched along three sides of the Franklin School building, on K street, 13th street and the alley on the south side of the structure. And in that line is ambitious juvenile Washington.

Dress Both Ways. Some of the boys thought it was a party. They came dressed in their best, hair well wet and metted down, clothes that still had the threads of the price mark tags on them and shoes elaborately blacked. Others came in workday condition, tough skin being the principal protection for their feet and legs and articles of clothing as few in number as possible. One little ten-year-old chap tugged at the hand of his mother when he reached the school building about 10 o'clock and his maternal ancestor soon put him in The boys around him were tall and older, and Willie's mother became worried over his prospects. Finally she appealed to the officer who was using his best efforts to keep the boys in line. "Officer, can't I get my boy right in," she pleaded. "He's so little the other boys pick on him."

The man in the uniform tried to assure the woman he would keep a watchful eye on the little tot. The mother continued to plead. Her youngster did not need "watchful" He had both fists doubled up al-

him and the nearest boy and was saying something pointed about whom he could The chief trouble of the boys was in egard to the time required in getting a badge after arrival at the school building. The best record this morning was three hours and twenty-three minutes. A boy, in line for some two hours, gradually sliding along the pavement, upon which he is seated, finally arrives at the gate of the schoolyard. He has been watching those immediately ahead of him march in and envies them. Lunch time is near. He hopes he can get into the building within a couple of minutes. He knows he can then get his badge and be away inside of ten minutes. Only Part on His Way. Finally his turn comes. He walks over the basement entrance and down to the areaway. There he is surprised to find all his old friends whom he saw going into the building just before him. He waits another half hour and sees one after the other of his friends called in-
